Introduction

This booklet contains the family tree of two brothers whose descendants are now spread from Ireland to New Zealand, Australia and America.

John O'Neill, the elder brother, had four children in his marriage to his third cousin Biddy Mulholland. Their eldest child, James, is known only from the baptismal records. After Biddy's death, John married another third cousin, Alice O'Neill, and we know of at least six children from this marriage, in some cases knowing only the names. There may have been three other children in the family. Four of John's children emigrated to New Zealand, while one stayed in Ireland.

James Stafford, known as Stafford, received a canonical dispensation to marry Cecily O'Neill, due to their degree of relatedness. Stafford died of typhoid. Of his ten children, five emigrated to New Zealand, three to the U.S.A, and two remained in Ireland. Joseph is the only one of his family whose death we have not yet traced. He is said to have been mugged in New York City sometime in the 1910's.

Most of the immigrants to New Zealand came to Otago (Southern N.Z.) and spread out from there. The links that they maintained with each other have made this family tree possible.

The townlands of Eden and Ballymacpeake, where the families came from, are small rural districts in Co. Derry across the River Bann from the town of Portglenone. The family's parish church is that of St. Mary's Greenlough, whose records begin in 1846. Where we have indicated a place beside a record of baptism, that is the address of the parents.

This project began with a reunion of the family of John and Margaret O'Neill (Page B) at Ranfurly, New Zealand in January 1977. Paddy O'Neill then began collecting details of the descendants of John O'Neill (1820-1900), and soon joined with Bernard O'Neill, who researched the descendants of Stafford O'Neill (1825-1883).

We hope that you find this work of ours worthwhile. The history that we have included here is rather sketchy. You may like to write your own family's history. We will be very pleased to receive copies of such.

Also available from us is a photograph album of the migrant generation and their children. Further copies of this booklet may be ordered from either of us.

The Surname O'Neill

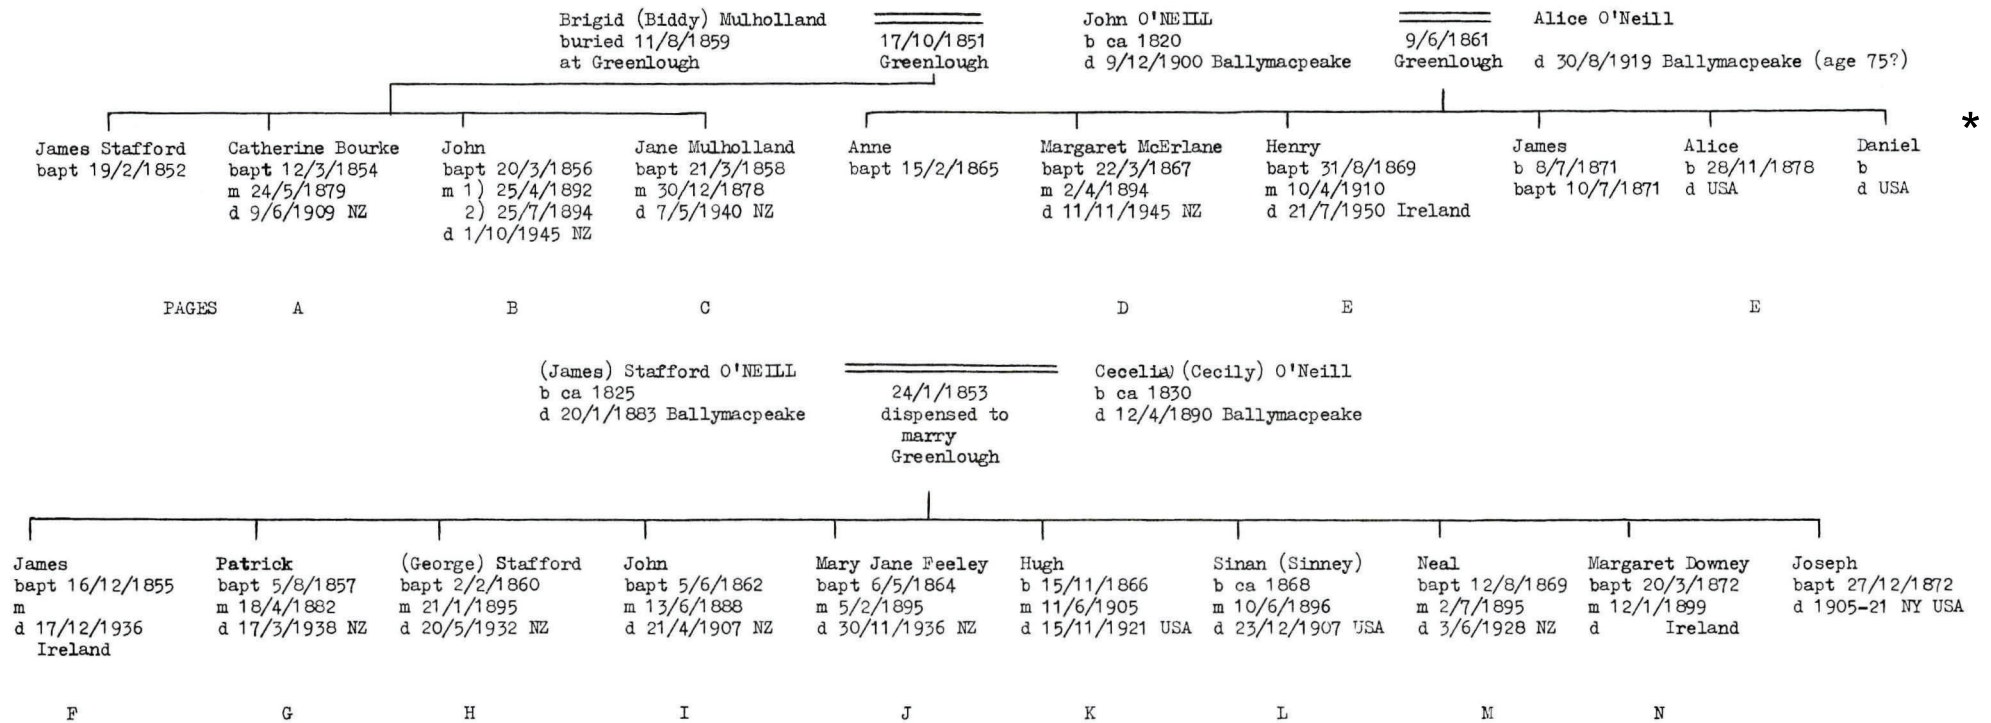

The first of the great Ulster sept to bear the surname O'Neill was Donell O'Neill, the eponymous ancestor being his grandfather Niall, King of Ireland, who was killed in a battle with the Norsemen in A.D. 919, not, as might be supposed, the famous Niall of the Nine Hostages, though that somewhat legendary and heroic character was also a remote ancestor. From that time until the end of the seventeenth century, when Ulster ceased to be the leading Gaelic province of Ireland, the O'Neills figure prominently among the great men of Irish history.

The O'Neills were the chief family of Cinel Eoghain, their territory being Tír Eoghain. Tír Eoghain (modern Tyrone) in early times comprised not only that county but most of Derry and part of Donegal. Down to the time of Brian Boru, who reigned from 1002 to 1014, the Ui Néill, i.e. descendants of Niall of the Nine Hostages, were, almost without interruption, High Kings of Ireland. Their race formed two main branches — the northern Ui Néill of Ulster and the southern Ui Néill, as those who established themselves in Meath were called. The latter did in fact occupy also part of southern Ulster contiguous with Meath. In the fourteenth century a branch of the Tyrone O'Neills migrated to Antrim where they became known as Clann Aodha Bhuidhe, from Aodh Buidhe (or Hugh Boy) O'Neill, who was slain in 1283, the term being perpetuated in the territorial name Clannaboy or Clandeboy. The attempts made by the English in the sixteenth century to exterminate them, which were carried out by Essex and others with a ferocity and perfidy seldom equalled even in that violent age, were unsuccessful, and O'Neills are numerous there today, as they are also in West Ulster. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries produced the most famous of the O'Neills: among them Con Bacach O'Neill (1484-1559), first Earl of Tyrone; Shane O'Neill (1530-1567); Hugh O'Neill (1540-1616), second Earl of Tyrone; Owen Roe O'Neill (1590-1649); Sir Phelim O'Neill (1604-1653); and Hugh O'Neill (d. 1660) — names too well known in the history of Ireland to require description here. Less famous but worthy of mention, even in so cursory a sketch as this, is Sir Niall O'Neill (1658-1690), whose regiment of dragoons distinguished itself at the battle of the Boyne, where he was mortally wounded. In the century following that disaster many O'Neills were to be found among the outstanding officers of the Irish Brigades in the French army. Arthur O'Neill (1737-1816), the blind wandering harper, may be regarded as the precursor of Bunting in the field of Irish traditional music; and John O'Neill (1834-1878) was leader of the Fenian invasion in Canada in 1867. All these were Ulstermen.

It may be remarked in conclusion that O'Neill is one of the very few surnames the spelling of which is identical in both the Irish and English languages. In Irish however, the E is accented.

Three daughters were added to this family in 2020:
Mary (b 1862),
Bridget (b 1874) and Sarah (b 1876).

Catherine arrived in Dunedin about 1875 where she worked as a domestic servant till she married David Bourke. David worked for the New Zealand Railways briefly at Milton, thereafter at Dunedin. A son was killed at the railway yards. Catherine died of cancer aged 55 years, and from then on the family was cared for by the eldest daughter, Sophia. Catherine's is the only family that had a number of children die in childhood.

John arrived at Port Chalmers as a ploughman on the ship "James Nicol Fleming" on 3 October, 1877, with his sister Jane, and his Mother's sister Margaret Cassidy, her husband and children. After working as a bullock driver in North Otago, and elsewhere, he took up land in Central Otago in 1886. His first wife Nellie died tragically of peritonitis shortly after their wedding. John later married Margaret Doorley and continued to farm at Patearoa until their retirement at Ranfurly.

Margaret left Ireland with her cousins Neal and Mary-Jane. When the three people arrived in Port Chalmers, she travelled to Ranfurly with John and Jane (O'Neill) Mulholland by buggy and pair. The cost of a ship's fare from Rockhampton, Australia to Port Chalmers, Dunedin was 2 pounds. Distance 2,500 kilometres.

She then worked at Patearoa sheep station for 10 shillings a week. In 1894 she married, and she lived for the rest of her life as a neighbour of her sister Jane (O'Neill) Mulholland.

Harry inherited the farm on which his father had lived, and when he died it was inherited by Hugh O'Neill, the son of Harry's cousin James.

THE HOMES OF THE TWO O'NEILL BROTHERS

The house in which John, Bidy and Alice brought up their children.
Now inhabited by Mrs Kathleen O'Neill.

The house in which Stafford and Cecily brought up their children.
Now abandoned, but Stafford and Angela O'Neill have a new home beside it.

James was the eldest of the Stafford O'Neill family. He became a Sergeant in the Royal Irish Constabulary in the south of Ireland, but later took on the family farm.

For some reason the family had lost part of their farm, but years later at an auction James bought it back.

James' son Stafford, a bachelor, eventually took over the family farm, which at present his nephew, also Stafford, and his wife Angela, are farming. A new home has now been built very close to the old Stafford O'Neill homestead.

George Stafford, known as Stafford, firstly travelled to the U.S.A., and worked in a brickyard in New York city. Then he went back to Ireland and on to New Zealand with the ship "Bombay" (both sail and steam and built of iron) as a steerage passenger. He arrived at Port Chalmers (Dunedin) on 24 January, 1884. On his first night in Dunedin he stayed at the "Gridiron Hotel", now known as "George's Tavern".

Later Stafford travelled to Tasmania. Whilst there the Bank he had his money in went broke. He then came back to New Zealand to marry and settle as a farmer at Patearoa in Central Otago.

John came to New Zealand, and probably landed at Port Chalmers, Dunedin. He married, and lived in the North Otago area until 1906. He was a hotelier at Kurow for some time, and for a short time also had a farm near Oamaru.

Whilst out hare shooting near Omarama he was run over by a buggy wheel and badly hurt. The whole family then moved to the Masonic Hotel in Wellington. John died there in 1907. Mrs O'Neill and family then continued as hoteliers at Inglewood, Taranaki in the North Island of New Zealand.

Mary Jane (O'Neill) Feeley

J1

Mary Jane left Ireland with her brother Neal and cousin Margaret O'Neill as an assisted immigrant, for Rockhampton, Queensland, Australia. Legally, they were meant to stay two years there, but they came on to Port Chalmers (Dunedin) in 1890.

She was met at the ship by her cousin Jane (O'Neill) Mulholland and husband John Mulholland. Mary Jane soon settled in Oamaru. She and her husband Edward were the first couple married in St. Patrick's Basilica, Oamaru.

Hugh went to the U.S.A. and was married in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York City. He settled at Newburgh in New York State. On his mother's death certificate we note that Hugh was present at her death in 1890 in Ireland and signed the necessary documents. For a time he was a ships mate for the Central Steamboat Co. in New York.

Sinan went to Newburgh, New York, U.S.A. and married and settled there. He was accidentally killed in 1907. His death certificate shows that he was a railway car inspector. He was always known as Sinney O'Neill, and only recently was his 'proper' name learned, which is a variant of Sean. Until a few years ago, all that was known of Sinney was that he went to the U.S., and it was only when his son John visited Derry that contact was re-established, and thus also with the descendants of Hugh O'Neill.
